What can you do with fermented mass if you don't have a garden or plants?

If you don't have a garden or plants, we strongly encourage you to consider getting some plants and perhaps even starting your own garden. There are many benefits to both of these options. However, there are some other ways to use your bokashi cake.

Hopefully, your local waste-collection provider offers separate biowaste containers. If that's the case, you can always discharge your bokashi cake in those bins.

Another great option is to bury your pre-compost mass next to a tree. Before doing so, make sure to check with your local authorities for details, especially if this is a public tree. However, if this option is allowed, it is a great way to give back to nature. But make sure you don't dig the hole too close to the tree, since fermented mass is very acidic and needs more time to stabilize. In the end, cover it with soil. This bokashi cake uses alternatives also serve as a great exercise. Digging a hole will get your blood pumping while breathing some fresh air.

Nonetheless, you can also give your bokashi cake to other people that may need it and be more than happy to take it off your hands. So, if you have friends, coworkers, or other acquaintances with indoor plants, gardens, or even farms, make sure to first explain to them about your nutrient-rich bokashi cake and then offer them your plant resources. In addition, you can also use social media or our forum to connect with new people near you who might be interested in using your pre-compost mass.
